Dedicated to Lee Camp, C. V.
On Unveiling the Monument to their Fallen Comrades.
BY JULIUS DIENELT.

"To arms! to arms!" rang loudly through the South;

"Defend your homes against the Northern throng, Which, lately by their president called out, Is marching onward, several thousand strong, Defend your sacred rights, by law laid down, Defend them, as a century before, Your grand sires did, when England's grasping Imposed its stamps and taxes by the score." Thus ran the cry, still gaining force and strength, While it re-echoed through the breadth and length Of all the States, that had by vote agreed, In toto, from the Union to secede.

In ready quick response from far and near, The youth, the riper manhood of the South, At once came to the rescue without fear, Resolved to keep the bold intruders out.

The clash of arms at last came at Bull Run; Sword meeting sword, gun bravely meeting gun. Long was the struggle, hot and fierce the fight. Before enemy broke ranks in hasty flight, Yet, for some reason, never well explained, The gray coats threw away the glorious victory gained.

By resting on their laurels, bravely won,— Supposing, doubtless, that their work was done. Thus Abram Lincoln gained the needed time To send for men to every foreign clime, To every country, every distant land, To aid him in the arduous task in hand, By means of force to bring the solid South (Now on the very eve of going out) Back to the Union, which could never stand, Without her best, the favored Southern land.

And now, supplied with ready means and men, The Northern States anew the strife began. Long was the struggle, fiercely vexed the fight, While both sides claimed that they were in the right.

Both showed their mettle, showed their daring pluck, And many a reckless, sudden blow was struck. The sabre had no time to gather rust, And friend and foe were forced to bite the dust.

With varied fortune raged the cruel war,— Brought in its wake destruction near and far; Both sides determined not to yield or bend, But to hold out unto the bitter end.

The world looked on in wonder and in awe, And all of history no fiercer struggle saw; And though both sides earned glory and renown, It's to the boys in gray, we'll have to yield the crown.

Beyond a doubt, they were most ably fed, (Though heaven knows, too often poorly fed.) Barefooted, ragged, sometimes starved and sore, The rank and file the brunt of battle bore; And though great hardship was their daily portion,

They struggled on in almost blind devotion; They trust in God and in their leaders' skill, Who likewise bore their hardships with a will. Homed in on every side, and from the world shut out,

'Twas but a task of time, at last to starve them out. Bare of supplies, and scarce of men and food, Their bravery alone could do their cause no good. And when at last compelled to leave the field, It was not cowardice, but hunger made them yield.

Four years, they held the mighty host at bay, Then came the end—on Appomattox day.

To the Statue, as ideal representative of the Confederate Soldier:

With downcast face and with your hat in hand, In mournful and in silent grief you stand. Lift up your head! your cause is lost and gone, But surely not for lack of duty done.

Have no regrets, you could not stem the tide, Which bold and brave you had for years defied. The bravest do not always gain success, And history will praise your deeds no less.

None knew this better than the boys in blue, Who on the field of crossed their swords with you; And who, since blessed peace reigns in the land, With one accord held out the brother hand.

And who, should there be need, with pride Would march and battle by your side, Forgetful of the fact that, face to face, In strife with you was formerly their place.

The demagogue, who still for selfish ends Displays the bloody shirt and hair's fire brands; Who sowed danger only from afar, And who gained riches by the cruel war, Is not your friend; and gladly would renew A baneful strife that but impoverished you. The day will come, of wiser counsel born, When his reward will be a nation's scorn.

The Fates have willed that, in this glorious land, The union of the States is for all time to stand. And having faith that Providence knew best, You cheerfully accepted its behest; And no one loves the union more to-day Than do your comrades, who in gray the gray. The stars and stripes, the emblem of the brave, Again is yours; forever may it wave!
